Heckfield Place

Our speaker for January was a "last minute replacement" which proved to be very lucky for us! Robert Louth, Garden Manager at Heckfield Place brought along copies of his illustrated pamphlet The Gardens at Heckfield Place and explained the extensive programme being employed by the new owners to restore the gardens, preserve the views, introduce an English Apples orchard and ancient breeds grazing.

He explained the history of the area and introduced us to the special relationship between Lord Eversley and his Head Gardener, William Walker Wildsmith, (whose pink memorial with roses can be found in Heckfield Churchyard). He is immensely proud of the fantastic collection of trees, including a 120' Abies Grandis Fir – the largest in Europe and requiring 5 tree-huggers to encircle it! We will definitely be organising a trip to Heckfield Place when the weather warms up.

A reminder that membership renewals are overdue. Please complete the membership form we sent and return it to the address shown, or bring it along to the next meeting. Copy renewal forms can be found on the website. Thanks!

Border ware Pottery – serialisation of Jacqui Pearce's (University of London) lecture for the Yateley Society - part four

In the mid C16 dramatic changes took place in the Border ware industry, as a tougher more versatile fabric was introduced, together with range of new shapes, such as large platters, tripod pipkins and porringers. These were made nowhere else in South-east England, and similarities show continental influence from the Rhineland. Typology provided the only connection until recently, when Peter Tipton, while investigating Border ware potters, found a German potter, Herman Rainold in the 1585 Lay Subsidy. He is recorded as a potter in Farnborough, indicated as an alien and taxed 4d. A shrievalty bond of 1591 has also been found, and the will of Herman Reynolds dates to 1609. These three good references add substance to the German connection. In the second half of the C16, when Reynolds brought German shapes and technology to the Border ware area. The shapes introduced include big dishes, the tripod pipkin, a cooking vessel common in the Cologne area, adapted to take a lid and with a hollow tubular handle, a form not otherwise found in south-east England. Other forms include the skillet with 3 feet and handle (there were many of these at Farnborough Hill in the late C16), and porringers for spoon food, with a single loop handle and often used for heating food (again a Rhineland type). There are also costrels, but now an upright, bottle-shaped type in contrast with the earlier mammiform shape, but still retaining the holes for suspending on a leather thong. Whiteware remained the most common fabric, because it was popular in London, but the glaze colour varied through the C17.

Each of the former Surrey whiteware pottery industries found its own market niche. The redware of Kingston and Cheam was practical and undecorated, while Border whiteware used green and clear glazes, and also introduced a brown (manganese) glaze. The use of glaze colours was reserved for particular shapes and vessel types: for example, jugs were green in keeping with the medieval tradition. Once the industry had been reinvigorated it produced a wide range of shapes, responding quickly to new needs and fashions. So the late C16 and early C17 was very creative for Border ware in marked contrast with the late medieval conservatism. All kinds of activities were catered for, not just the traditional cooking storage and tableware, because items such as moneyboxes, candlesticks, chafing dishes and many more were produced. The market was hungry for different forms and the potters responded. The contracts with the Inns of Court for traditional wares continued as a specialised activity.

YATELEY MEMORABILIA

Our members produced old maps, photographs, bottles, books, crockery and clothing for our December meeting, all with a Yateley theme and "mulled" over with wine and mince pies. A lovely evening was had by all.

An unexpected bit of nature.

This incident occurred as a result of a regular conservation work party on Yateley Common.

During the September 07 session we came across a wasps' nest built into the entrance of a disused rabbit hole, the hole being completely blocked by the typical wall of striped brown and buff papier-mâché. It seemed a bit exposed and liable to damage from any heavy rain, so Mary and I went back on the next sunny morning to take a photograph while it was intact.

We found that the rabbit hole, and therefore the nest as well, was partly obscured by a branch of heather. I looked around to see where the heather was rooted so that I could move it without damage; then an unusually regular pattern in the undergrowth caught my eye, about four feet beyond the hole, I realised that a coiled up adder was watching us with great interest. Needless to say I quietly asked Mary to stand clear and then quickly photographed the adder, just before it decided that it was too risky to stay around and slid away; then I took my picture of the wasps' nest.
